Many of your assignments and discussion posts will require you to use and cite information from scholarly or peer reviewed sources. As you begin to work on your research assignments, here are a few key things to keep in mind when developing your search strategies to find this information:

- Make sure to have a clear, focused, and relevant research question or statement.
- Break your research question into a few key concepts/keywords. You might have 2-4 key concepts or keywords describing the components of your research question.
- Brainstorm potential synonyms or related terms for your concepts/keywords. Broaden your search by considering all of the different ways that you can describe a concept using synonyms or related terms.
- Create a Boolean search string connecting your concepts/keywords. Use AND, OR, or NOT to narrow or broaden your search by including or excluding concepts/keywords.
- Start in PowerSearch or select an appropriate database. PowerSearch, which is the search box on the library's homepage, can be a great way to start your research since it searches most of the library's databases at the same time. While PowerSearch allows you to think broadly about your topic, you will need to thoroughly filter your results to find appropriate sources. Using a specific database, such as CINAHL, APA PsycInfo, or Social Sciences Full Text, will focus your search towards articles in a particular subject area. Different databases may be better suited to specific topics; others (e.g., Academic Search Complete) are interdisciplinary and cover a variety of subjects.
- Set your limiters or filters. Each database will have built-in limiters (or filters) to narrow your search results by various parameters (e.g., Publication Date, Scholarly/Peer-Reviewed Sources, Full Text).
- Examine your results and continue to refine and adjust your search string. As you consider your results, you might identify stronger search terms or related concepts to add to your query.

Please feel free to reach out to us with any questions! You can e-mail us at reference@regiscollege.edu or schedule an appointment using this Research Consultation Request form. Library hours can be found on the library's website.
