Why Should I Learn Excel?

Over 80% of jobs require spreadsheet and word processing skills, and Excel continues to be in the top three skills employers are looking for in people they hire, no matter what that job is. Excel is not just for making tables.

Three Reasons to Learn Excel (Properly)

1. Excel will make you better at your job, no matter what that job is. Regardless of what you do, chances are that there is a way for Excel to help you do your job better. It's the standard, and one of the most widely used programs across the globe.

2. Excel will help you get your work done faster. No professional ever said “I don’t want to get through my work more efficiently.” Excel will save you a ton of time at your job and in your personal life.
3. Knowing Excel will give you more hiring options. Excel is a transferable skill that any hiring manager understands is critical. That’s the beauty of knowing such a universal computer program.

Regis offers free software training, including 17 different Excel classes. The next Excel series starts July 27. See the complete training list and more information on the Training & Professional Development site.

Secrets for academic success? Start with a goal implementation plan.

In past editions of GradWire, we've shared tips and strategies individual students have found helpful in managing the demands of a rigorous academic workload. Beginning with this edition, we'd like to provide resources prepared by the Finucane & O'Sullivan Institute for Learning such as a helpful plan you'll find in this goal setting video.

In the video, a student sets a goal to successfully complete all the demands of her asynchronous course starting by writing down all due dates in her agenda. "I'll also focus on all the assignments I have to do this week," she says, "and space them out to have enough time to complete. I will speak with my professors over email or through office hours to review the schedule I made and ask for any potential edits or modifications. If my assignment schedule works out successfully, I will implement the same plan next week. Specific resources I will use to help me for the early portion of my asynchronous course—I'll use library services such as databases, research guides and assistance from the librarians. If I'm struggling with understanding a concept mentioned in the reading, or need help with an assignment, I'll use office hours, attend a study group session or explore tutoring services."

Now, it's your turn to share your sage wisdom. If you have a tip you'd like to share in an upcoming issue of GradWire, please submit it here.
